Lemurs are generally small in size, and their face somewhat resembles a mouse's face in smaller species or a fox's face in larger species. Many lemur species have a snout, and all have a wet and hairless nose with curved nostrils, which is unique among primates and makes them superior sniffers. They have five digits on front and hind limbs, and some species have longer hind limbs than forelimbs for jumping. Their tail is not prehensile and varies in length, depending on the species. Lemurs range greatly in size from the mouse lemurs to the indri. Lemurs have bright round eyes and soft fur that varies in colour, depending on the species. The most common lemur colours are white, grey, black, brown, and red-brown. In some species, males and females have different colouring. For example, in blue-eyed black lemurs, males are solid black and females are reddish-brown.

Lemurs that are diurnal (active during the daytime), are social and live in family groups or troops. They follow the safety-in-numbers idea, using alarm calls when a predator is spotted to inform the rest of the group. Nocturnal lemurs do not live in large groups, but have the cover of night to help protect them. And, some lemurs are active day and night. The primary predator of lemurs is the fossa, although they can fall prey to large boas, hawks, and introduced species, as well.
